

long-jump, discus, javelin throw, wrestling, and boxing. The element of danger in chariot racing is illustrated with a reading from Sophocles while a chariot race scene from a movie is played out before a cheering crowd.

In the section entitled "Rewards, Scandals, and Politics," Romano notes that only a first prize was given for each event, and the victorious athletes were given a free meal every day in their home towns. The monuments described by Pausanias are given brief mention, and an ode of Pindar is read illustrating the fact that both the victor and his home city were honored. Several examples of victors are given along with their stories, and a discussion of women's participation is included.

The visuals of this video are excellent with coins, vase paintings, sculptures, and pictures of the sites accompanied by maps, models, and line drawings. These ancient artifacts are sometimes compared to, sometimes superimposed on, modern athletic contests. The readings of the Pindaric ode, Homer's Iliad, and the athletes' oath are also used to good effect in bringing to the modern student the importance, the tension, and the excitement of the ancient Olympics.
